Historical Note

The Washington State Labor Council (WSLC) was formed on Nov. 4, 1957, when the Washington branches of the American Federation of Labor (AFL) and the Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) merged. These two labor bodies were bitter rivals in the 1930s, but the need to cooperate to defeat right-to-work measures (Initiative 198 in 1956 and Initiative 202 in 1958) ultimately cemented their alliance. After defeating these measures, labor groups took the offensive. The United Labor Lobby (ULL) -- a group that evolved from the committees created to battle the right-to-work initiatives -- won an extension of the 40 hour maximum work week for all Washington workers, as well as an expansion of the unemployment insurance system in 1959. The ULL and WSLC were not able to follow up on these victories in the early 1960s as the increasingly Republican state legislature soon forced labor back on the defensive.

When Evan (Ed) Weston retired as the WSLC president in 1961, Joe Davis was elected to succeed him. Davis was responsible for strengthening voter registration and the get-out-the-vote drives for the organization. In 1966 Davis launched a major new effort, dubbed Project '66, to expand the influence of labor and broaden its political agenda. Project '66 also increased the amount of money that member unions paid to the Council and doubled the WSLC staff. These changes allowed the Council to monitor government agencies more closely and to lobby on new subjects of legislative interest, such as tax reform and consumer protection. The new program did score a few notable victories, particularly the increased influence in the Washington Department of Labor and Industries. In addition, the Council won limited collective bargaining rights for public employees in 1967, broadened the workers' compensation program to include virtually all workers in 1971, provided assistance to the passing of civil rights laws in the 1960s, and was instrumental in enacting several consumer protection laws in the 1970s. Project '66 thus increased the number of issues on which the Council had legislative influence, and built greater cooperation between labor, civil rights, and consumer protection groups. Nonetheless, the WSLC did not substantially increase its ability to elect labor-friendly candidates to the legislature. As such, labor remained vulnerable to lobbying assaults from employer groups throughout the 1970s and 1980s, suffering occasional defeats in struggles over the workers' compensation and unemployment programs.
